

HOME > NEWS

NEWS OPINION RESEARCH CAREER HELP

SiliconValley.com
INSIDE THE TECH ECONOMY

ADVERTISEMENT

Posted at 10:58 p.m. PDT Sunday, July 15, 2001

 E-Mail This Story

Print this story

Top VC Doerr apologizes for helping fuel dot-com frenzy

BY TIA O'BRIEN

Mercury News

Silicon Valley's highest-profile venture capitalist, John Doerr, publicly apologized Sunday for his famous statement that characterized the Internet as ``the largest legal creation of wealth in the history of the planet."

The Internet boom that took off in the late 1990s, when he made the statement, has gone bust. And Doerr, the visionary venture capitalist who backed Netscape and Amazon, suggested his description of the Internet as a money machine was wrong.

``I'm here today with something of an apology," he told a gathering of congressional Democrats and technology industry leaders meeting in San Francisco over the weekend.

By billing wealth over innovation, Doerr says, his oft-repeated quote helped fuel a dot-com frenzy that focused more on a ``mercenary" drive to make quick fortunes off Internet start-ups than on incubating businesses with revolutionary technology.

Doerr also offered a bleak prediction Sunday that the nation has entered a technology recession that will last longer and could spread wider than some economists have forecast. Although some have suggested the downturn could ease by the end of this year, Doerr said he was betting on mid-2002.

In his speech Sunday before the New Democrat Network at the Fairmont Hotel, Doerr offered a revised version of his Internet quote. He projected a slide on a screen that described the Internet as ``the largest legal creation (and evaporation) of wealth in the history of the planet."

Despite his apology, Doerr stressed he wasn't backing away from another notable statement he made about the Internet's potential as an engine of innovation.

``I stand by my statement that the Internet was -- and is -- under-hyped," said the venture capital powerhouse, who urged the Democrats to remain believers in the New Economy. ``The sky has not fallen, although valuations have fallen from sky-high," he said, describing start-ups.

Doerr's breakfast speech Sunday capped off the New Democrat Network's fifth annual West Coast retreat, an event designed to educate members of Congress on Silicon Valley issues.

The meeting, attended by 17 congressional Democrats, was co-sponsored by TechNet, the bipartisan political lobbying group co-founded by Doerr.

The venture capitalist, who is a partner of the premier venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, has used his growing political clout to back major candidates, including Al

Gore in his presidential bid.

Throughout the weekend, several prestigious economists and high-tech leaders made predictions about when the economic downturn will ease. Doerr's forecast was the gloomiest.

He bluntly stated that the nation is experiencing a technology recession that has spread to Europe and Asia and could spark a broad-based recession throughout the general economy.

Doerr contended that companies are overreacting to bad economic news, and, partly as a result, he doesn't expect a turnaround until ``the middle of 2002 with a lot of pain between now and then."

Doerr proposed one possible cure: a one-year write-off for technology investments, as a way of spurring companies that have drastically reduced technology spending. Although many Democrats applauded the idea, they predicted it would be difficult to enact because Congress has just approved the Bush administration's tax cuts.

Looking ahead, Doerr warned that New Economy entrepreneurs must focus on something more than money.

``There's a battle going on for the soul of the entrepreneur," Doerr said. ``It's a contest between missionaries and mercenaries."

Contact Tia O'Brien at tobrien@sjmercury.com.

NEWS HEADLINES:
BREAKING NEWS	REUTERS	MERCURY NEWS
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • RSA announces fix for wireless network security hole [4:47am PST 12/17] • B2B e-commerce could save firms trillions, study says [4:38am PST 12/17] • Amgen to acquire Immunex for $16 billion [3:07am PST 12/17] • Three-horse race remains to acquire AT&T Broadband [1:58am PST 12/17] • Japan to air first all-made-in-space TV commerical [1:47am PST 12/17] 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Web portal Excite UK will shut down this week [6:30am PST 12/17] • Expedia to postpone vote on USA Networks deal [6:30am PST 12/17] • SONICblue Music device advances its Digital strategy [9:22pm PST 12/16] • KPN to detail i-mode-type Europe Service DoCoMo [8:14pm PST 12/16] • Dr Koop lifecare to close, file for bankruptcy [6:46pm PST 12/16] 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • HP, Compaq face antitrust hurdle in U.S., Europe [2:08am PST 12/17] • S.F. biotech company builds buzz by expanding on fruit-fly research [2:07am PST 12/17] • New fund helps valley's non-profit agencies [1:23am PST 12/17] • Valley cities are curbing right turns on red [1:17am PST 12/17] • Universal to release copy-protected CD in U.S. [6:38pm PST 12/16]

